

The new context of the economic relations between Cuba and the United States
Authors: PhD Jourdy Victoria James Heredia
Msc. Faustino Cobarrubia Gómez
Center for Research on World Economy, Cuba

The economic relations between Cuba and the United States historically have been subordinated to the political relations between the two countries, dynamic that lasts until today, of geopolitical interests of the northern country with respect to Cuba, and those of this state for their sovereignty and independence national. Following the triumph of the Cuban Revolution in 1959 and transformations that this produced, the dispute reached a new level between the two countries, because of the United States' refusal to accept a socialist project in its area of influence, which led, among other measures, the economic, commercial and financial blockade towards the caribbean country, which remains to this day, even after the restoration of relations between the two states since mid-2015.

Key words: disagreement, Monroe Doctrine, blockade, revolution, Standardization, updating of the economic model