

Curriculum Vitae

Gladys Cecilia Hernandez-Pedraza is Deputy Director and Senior Research Fellow at the Department of Global Financial Tendencies, Center for World Economy Studies. She received her bachelor in International Relations from Moscow's International Relations Institute in and her Master in Philosophy and History at Havana University. She has also completed Graduate Studies in Foreign Insurance at the Foreign Insurance Institute in Havana. From the beginning, her research has dealt with world economic issues. Her activity at the Center for World Economy Studies in Cuba has focused on economic, and social reforms and environmental policies in developing economies. Her recent research activity includes some analytical contributions regarding the international financial system, and the impacts of climate change. Some of her academic achievements during the last 30 years are the publication of several papers and books, participation in various international and Cuban symposiums and workshops, and the advising of government and non-government institutions on economic issues related to world economy and environmental issues. She has carried out research works related to the main tendencies in world economy and theirs effects on developing economies: foreign debt, financial crisis, direct foreign investment, world trade challenges of the current globalization, food sustainability, bioenergy, biodiversity impacts from climate change, renewable energy, adaptation and mitigation policies, social and gender problems. She has also published widely on these topics. Hernandez-Pedraza is fluent in English, French, Spanish, and Russian.